Ethos, logos, and pathos are classical rhetorical appeals that Aristotle originally identified as essential components of persuasive communication. Ethos: Credibility and Ethics

Ethos refers to the speaker's or writer's credibility and character. It involves establishing trust and authority to persuade an audience effectively. Ethos is demonstrated through expertise, reputation, and ethical appeal, which assures the audience that the communicator is reliable and knowledgeable.

Logos: Logical Reasoning

Logos appeals to logic and reason. It involves using facts, statistics, data, and rational arguments to support a claim. This appeal is critical for convincing audiences through clear, structured, and evidence-based reasoning that fosters intellectual agreement.

Pathos: Emotional Connection

Pathos targets the audience's emotions, seeking to evoke feelings such as empathy, fear, happiness, or anger. This appeal aims to create an emotional response that motivates the audience to accept a point of view or take action. Effective use of pathos can create powerful and memorable messages.
