Definition and Characteristics of Dynamic Characters

Dynamic characters are those who experience significant internal development during the course of a story. This change can be emotional, moral, psychological, or intellectual, reflecting a transformation in the character's core attributes. Typically, dynamic characters face challenges that compel them to reevaluate their values, beliefs, or behavior. This evolution is often crucial to the plot, as it drives the narrative forward and deepens the thematic complexity.

Key characteristics of dynamic characters include:

- Internal Change: The character undergoes a profound change within themselves rather than merely changing circumstances around them.
- Growth or Regression: The change can be positive growth, such as learning empathy, or negative regression, like succumbing to darker impulses.

- Relevance to Plot: Their transformation is integral to the story's development and resolution.
- Complexity: Dynamic characters are multifaceted, with motivations and conflicts that evolve realistically.

- Dynamic Characters: Undergo significant internal change, experience growth or regression, and contribute to thematic depth.
